Life on earth could smell millions of years before it could see. Human infants can feel, taste, hear, and smell well before they take their first blurry look at the world. This morning, we ourselves awoke moments before opening our eyes, and to the same darkness we shall return tonight. If vision rules in the realm of the senses, then it does so as a latecomer, an upstart.

Poets from Orpheus to Baudelaire have often called us away from sight. But consider the dominant rubrics of contemporary literary analysis: theory (from theôrein, “to see”), ideology (from idein, “to see”), representation (almost always understood as a question of images).

What would happen if we tried to begin literary analysis not with sight, but with any (or all) of the remaining senses? At the simplest level, we would need to pay closer attention to the synesthetic language of our poets. We would also need to treat literature not as bodiless text but as a physical object, realized in wax, papyrus, parchment, stone, and susceptible therefore to engagement by senses other than sight. We would need to strive to listen once again to poetry, privileging—like ancient euphonist critics—sound over meaning. In sum, we would need to open our senses to meanings and pleasures not solely or simply visual. Even vision, in the end, potentially emerges from the Platonic nexus of sight and truth as, instead, something sensual, made of colors and shapes—a collaborator with its sister senses, rather than their overlord.

Co-organized by Shane Butler, Alex Purves, and MarioTelò, Department of Classics, UCLA

Support for this conference has been provided by a generous grant from the Ahmanson Foundation, with additional funding provided by the UCLA Center for Medieval and Renaissance Studies, the UCLA Vice Chancellor for Research, the Humanities Division of the UCLA College of Letters and Science, and the UCLA Department of Classics.
The UCLA Center for Medieval and Renaissance Studies presents a CMRS Ahmanson Conference

SYNESTHESIA

Friday, April 30, 2010
Royce Hall 314, UCLA

Registration, Coffee 3:15
Curtis Dozier (Vassar College)
“Reading in the Dark: Poetic Obscurity in Ancient Rome”

Session 4

Registration, Coffee 2:00
Gerard Passannante (University of Maryland)
“The Pervasive Influence”

Session 7

Alex Purves (UCLA)
“Haptic Herodotus”

2:45
Sean Keilen (College of William and Mary)
“The Sense of Innocence”

3:30 Break
James Tatum (Dartmouth College)
“Ragging the Classics” Note: this event will take place in the Schoenberg Music Building, Room 1440.

Session 8

3:45
Ashley Clements (Trinity College Dublin)
“Tasteful Glances, Pungent Looks: Popular Epistemology and the Reciprocity of Sight in Aristophanes”

Mario Teló (UCLA)
“Aristophanes, Cratinus, and the Smell of Comedy”

4:30

5:15 Closing Remarks

Saturday, May 1, 2010
Royce Hall 314, UCLA

Session 5

Registration, Coffee 8:30
Ralph M. Rosen (University of Pennsylvania)
“Plato on Beauty and Philosophical Synesthesia”

Session 2

9:00
Joshua T. Katz (Princeton University)
“Saussure’s Anaphonie: Sounds Asunder”

9:15 Shane Butler (UCLA)
“Beyond Narcissus”

9:45 Mark Payne (University of Chicago)
“Sound and Sense in Ancient Narrative”

Session 6

9:00
Katharina Yolkk (Columbia University)
“Manlius’ Cosmos of the Senses”

10:45
Mark Bradley (University of Nottingham)
“Color as Synaesthetic Experience in Antiquity”

11:00 Brian Walters (UCLA)
“Experiencing Death in Ancient Rome”

10:00 James I. Porter (UC Irvine)
“Why Are There Nine Muses?”

10:45 Break

11:45 James McHugh (University of Southern California)
“The Toilette of the Idols: Reflections on the Study of Smell and Aromatics in Early India”

11:00

12:30 Lunch

1:30 Candace Weddle (University of Southern California)
“Making Sense of Emperor Worship: The Sensory Experience of Roman Imperial Cult Sacrifices”

1:45
Mark Bradley (University of Nottingham)
“Color as Synaesthetic Experience in Antiquity”

2:00

2:15
Cathy Keane (Washington University in St. Louis)
“Nucibus receptis: The Sensations of Persius’ Satires”

2:15

3:00 Break

2:15

3:00 Lunch

Illustration: “Jason and the Golden Fleece” by James Thacker, oil on panel, 2005